IN SOUTH KOREA, UNIVERSITY STUDENTS ARE FIGHTING TO SAVE ONE OF COUNTRY'S OLDEST HINDI LANGUAGE PROGRAMMES

The Korean government has recently announced plans to remove the 11 languages that it will not support its culture and education ministry, including Hindi, from its list of 23 supported languages. The decision comes in the wake of growing concerns among Hindi speakers in South Korea who were educated in Hindi language universities saying that knowledge of Hindi would be of little financial return.

The decision has triggered a campaign among students and scholars across the country to save the Hindi language program at the University of Seoul. The university, which has been offering Hindi courses for over 50 years, has announced that it will discontinue the program from next year.

The students and scholars have been holding protests and rallies to save the program, saying that it is an important part of their cultural heritage and that it provides them with job opportunities. They have also raised concerns about the potential impact of the decision on the Indo-Korean community, which has a long history of cultural exchange.

The students have also approached the government to reconsider its decision, saying that they are prepared to take legal action if the program is closed.

The government has stated that it is committed to maintaining a balance between the preservation of cultural heritage and the need for economic growth. It has also said that it will provide funding for other language programs.

The decision has also sparked a debate on the role of government in supporting cultural programs. Some argue that the government should prioritize programs that have economic benefits, while others argue that cultural programs are important for national identity and should be supported regardless of their economic impact.

The students have also called for a public consultation on the issue, saying that they are prepared to work with the government to find a solution that meets the needs of both cultural preservation and economic growth.

The government has said that it will consider the students' and scholars' concerns when making its final decision, but has not provided any timeline for its decision-making process.

The students have also called for support from the international community, saying that they are preparing a petition to be sent to the United Nations to raise awareness about the issue.

BAGABAZU SLM FIRE
Over 1500 left homeless, CM promises to rebuild homes

People seek for their belongings amid the charred remains at Bagbazar slum on Thursday.

“SWEETY KUMARI:

The fire left nothing... life now seems more difficult than death”

Slum dwellers suspect sabotage, say promoters had threatened them to vacate the area earlier

Sweety Kumari, 60, has lost all her belongings. “I was waiting for the fire to end. Now I don’t know how I will feed my children. I have nothing left. I have been attending the Promoters who said they will provide me food and clothes. Now nothing is left. I don’t know what will happen to my children. I have been living in a slum for more than 50 years. I had a house, but now there is nothing. We have been provided with nothing. We will die of hunger. I don’t have any money. I don’t know what will happen. I think I will die. I don’t know how to survive,” said Sweety Kumari.

Allahabad HC welcomes a notable welcome of constitutional correction against reckless state intervention on personal life

The Allahabad High Court judgment striking down provisions of the Special Marriage Act, 1954 that make it mandatory for Indian citizens to get marriage certificates from religious and caste identities. But in practice, the public notice ended up giving vigilant groups, including sections of the Hindu community, the right to refuse to marry if they do not want to get married within the confines of Hinduism. The court, in its judgment, reiterated that the secularism of the Indian Constitution means allowing all communities to continue their cultural and religious practices without hindrance. The judgment has been widely welcomed across the political spectrum, with many social media users expressing their appreciation for the court's decision. However, some groups have criticized the judgment, saying it goes against the principles of national integration and Hindu majority.

Stories from THE CHACHA NEWS

The Chacha House report itself concludes that India’s importance to the UK is “incalculable”, and it is clear that no nation today can move forward without factoring in India. The next twoweeks will see India move into a critical period of high-profile international activity, both as an elected member of the UN Security Council and as host of the 2022 G20 Summit. India can leverage these positions of influence to centre a more demanding vision of international relations that disrupts the civilizational and value hierarchies that linger from India’s imperial era.

Trump impeached, but what’s the point now?

CATIE EMDONDSON
WASHINGTON, DC

The point of impeaching President Donald Trump a second time, after he won a record four-term presidency in the 2020 election, is December 2019, over the alleged abuse of power by him in the Trump administration. The article of impeachment charges him with “incitement of insurrection” in the United States. His supporters stormed the Capitol on January 6, 2021, while he was in office, leading to the permanent ouster of the then-President.

What is the political context?

The impeachment was inspired by the voters’ decision in the 2020 election. The article of impeachment charges Trump with “incitement of insurrection” in the United States. His supporters stormed the Capitol on January 6, 2021, while he was in office, leading to the permanent ouster of the then-President.

What are the legal consequences?

The Constitution allows for the removal of a President from office, which is the ultimate legal consequence of an impeachment. The process of impeachment involves the House of Representatives bringing charges against the President, followed by a trial in the Senate. If found guilty, the President can be removed from office.

What is the future of Trump and his party?

Donald Trump’s political future is in question after the second impeachment. The Republican Party is divided on whether to exclude him from public office. If he is barred from office, it would make him ineligible to run for future political positions. If he is not barred, he could run for office in 2024.

The policy covers adverse event on volunteers. The policy is effective for 12 months, some companies have taken more than one policy. Trump moved prospects of banned him from ever holding public office again.

NICHOLAS FANDOS
Washington, January 14

DONALD TRUMP on Wednesday has put his fate in the hands of the United States Senate, hoping for a last-minute Senate deal to prevent his impeachment from moving forward. As the Senate prepares to announce its final vote on the charge of incitement of insurrection, the president issued a statement that he would no longer pursue the option of a Senate trial despite raising the prospect of a vote to overturn the election.

Mr. Trump’s move comes as the Senate’s Republican leaders have been divided over whether to support a bid to overturn the election results, and as Mr. Trump has been increasingly isolated in his political party.

AIDES TO Mr. Trump have been trying to persuade him to accept a deal that would allow him to avoid a Senate trial and a possible conviction and permanent disqualification from office. The White House on Wednesday released a statement saying that Mr. Trump would no longer seek to overturn the election and would instead accept the results.

The Senate is likely to vote on Wednesday on whether to proceed with the trial, and if it does, it will likely be a close vote. A win by the Senate would mean that Mr. Trump could face trial in the House, and a loss would mean that he would be disqualified from office.

Mr. Trump’s decision not to seek a Senate trial comes as the Republican Party is divided over how to handle the former president, who has been a dominant figure in the party for years but who has been increasingly marginalized in recent months.

Mr. Trump has also been removed from Twitter, where he was previously a key source of political influence. The suspension of his account comes after he was accused of inciting violence at the Capitol last week.

The suspension of Mr. Trump’s account is a significant blow to his political influence, as he has relied heavily on social media to reach his supporters and spread his message.

The decision by Twitter to suspend Mr. Trump’s account comes as social media companies are facing increased pressure to take action against politicians who have been accused of spreading misinformation or inciting violence.

The decision by Twitter to suspend Mr. Trump’s account is likely to be welcomed by many who have been critical of his political influence, but it may also be seen as a setback for his ability to reach his supporters.

The suspension of Mr. Trump’s account is likely to be appealed, but it is unclear whether his account will be reinstated in the future.

The suspension of Mr. Trump’s account also comes as the Treasury Department has moved to seize his personal Twitter account, which he has used to share his ideas and reach his supporters, and to block his access to the platform.

Olympic champ Ravi Ketter was among the visitors at the U.S. Capitol.

Keller: Olympic gold medallist, failed salesman & now Capitol Hill rioter

On January 6, when a mob of US President Donald Trump supporters attacked the Capitol, Ketter was one of the crowds that got inside. Ketter is a 35-year-old man from Australia who won Olympic gold in the 400m freestyle swimming in 2004.

Ketter told the Guardian that he left his family for the US to pursue his dreams of becoming an Olympic athlete. He said he had been offered a job as a swimming coach in the US, but he had turned it down. Ketter said that, upon hearing about the attack, he had gone to the Capitol to take part in the protests and help his friend, a groundsman, who was stuck inside.

Ketter was one of the first people to be arrested after the attack, and he is now facing charges of misdemeanor and assault.

He said that he had been involved in the protests because he wanted to support his friend, who had been arrested at the Capitol.

Ketter is a successful businessman and has been a long-time supporter of Donald Trump.

“I am a proud American and a strong supporter of President Trump. I witnessed the attack on the Capitol with my own eyes,” Ketter told the Guardian.

He added: “I will never support any activity that endangers the safety of the American people or our democracy.”

The US Capitol riot has sparked a global backlash, with many countries condemning the attack and calling for an end to the violence.

Australia has also condemned the attack, and Prime Minister Scott Morrison has called for an immediate end to the violence.

In a statement, Morrison said: “This was a disgraceful act of violence against our democratic institutions and our democracy.”

He added: “We are united in the call for action against those behind this despicable act.”

The statement went on: “We are working with our partners around the world to ensure that this attack is not followed by any further acts of violence.”

The incident has also prompted an international condemnation, with many countries expressing their support for the US.

The US Capitol attack has also sparked a global debate about the role of social media in facilitating violent political rhetoric.

Social media platforms such as Twitter and Facebook have beencriticized for not doing enough to remove content that promotes violence and hate.

In Australia, the government has introduced new laws to tackle online harms, including fines of up to $10 million for companies that fail to remove illegal content.

The US Capitol attack has also sparked renewed calls for reform of the US healthcare system, with many people calling for universal health care.

In Australia, the government has recently announced plans to introduce a new Medicare freeze, which would see people paying more for their health care.

The US Capitol attack has also sparked renewed calls for action on climate change, with many people pointing to the role of the US in the global climate crisis.

In Australia, the government has recently announced plans to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 2030.
